

Caring for My Community

Caring for my community looks like being kind to others. Showing kindness can bring a community closer together. Being kind is important for people because it can make people feel positive about you and themselves. There are lots of opportunities to be kind in your community.

For example, a lot of days when I am outside I see one of my neighbors picking up leaves for neighboring houses. Even though he knows he doesn't need to pick up the leaves he does it anyway. This is caring for my community.

Another example of being kind is when someone in my neighborhood got COVID. He had been gone for a couple of months and was in intensive care. Even though my dad and I didn't know him, we went to a parade for him. This is caring for my community. Just because you don't know someone, you can still be kind, and that makes all the difference. This is caring for my community.

Two of my friends that live in my neighborhood decorated rocks to put in peoples yards. The rocks had little messages on them. They did this for no apparent reason. Just to be kind. This is caring for my community.

On Halloween my friend and I decorated brown paper bags with Halloween designs. After, we filled them with candy and biked to kids' houses to give them out. This is caring for my community. Because of COVID some kids couldn't trick or treat so we felt that it would be kind to do this. It was a small deed but it made all the difference to some kids. This is caring for my community.

These are all examples of being kind in your community. Kindness goes a long way. Little deeds, small deeds, they all help keep a community going. Without kindness everything would be sad. This is why kindness is important. This is what caring for my community looks like.
